Labour Market

The outbreak of the Asian financial crisis in the late 1990s challenged this traditional family model: women increasingly aimed for paid work to mitigate precarious family economics; men started to perceive the advantage of having a working wife. Although studies have shown that senior women do refer to mentoring as one of the strategies used to break through the glass ceiling, it is clearly not the only one, yet it is one that they could have some autonomy over.

Sociodemographic inequality in exposure to COVID

The purpose of the programme was for senior policewomen to share experiences, support and encourage other women who may aspire to progress further within the Police. We welcome feedback about this website.

How can mentoring support women in a male

Calendar year is an important explanatory variable, as its estimation will demonstrate the period changes in second birth fertility. Chronic low income is defined as having a family income under a low-income cut-off for five consecutive years or more. Legislation and policies at the state and local level should mandate, support, and encourage such practices.

Dual Studies at AI

Abstract Research on the socio-economic consequences of divorce or union dissolution has largely focused on women's loss of income after separation.

This report is organized into four parts.

Female labour force participation and second birth rates in South Korea

The paper tries to identify core integration barriers and possible sources of assistance for these hurdles. Their labour force participation has been on the rise, but at a very slow pace.

Gender and Careers

I think mentoring helps significantly in that area. Further subgroup analyses show that the association between perceived job insecurity and likelihood of a first birth is limited to college-educated women and those in low unemployment labor market regions. Immigrants with medium and low pre landing Canadian earnings had no earnings advantage relative to those without pre-landing Canadian earnings after immigration.
