Sheridan and his division did well enough at the confused and indecisive Battle of Perryville; the following December, however, they made history at the Battle of Murfreesboro. Borghum set out models of horses throughout the studio before she arrived and surprised Irene by how much he knew about her husband. Roosevelt gave a short speech praising Sheridan's valiant acts while Porter's speech was an in-depth review of Sheridan's life, including his days at and his campaigns during the Sheridan gave his age as eighteen years and one month, which would have meant that he was born in 1830, but he was not pressed by the admitting officer. All he wanted, he insisted, was to be given an opportunity to prove what he knew he was capable of: whipping Jeb Stuart, the dashing bane of Federal cavalry. Following the Union victory, Sheridan renamed the horse Winchester.
