His three best-known disciples were al-Bāhilī, aṣ-Ṣu'ūkī, and Ibn Mujāhid, all of whom transmitted the doctrines of their master to what later became the flourishing school of Khorāsān. It had become apparent to him that, in his former disputations, the reality of God as well as that of man had become so sterilized and desiccated that it had become little more than matter for rational manipulation. He founded a theological school that later claimed as members such celebrated authors as al-Ghazālī and.

Al-Ash'arī, conscious of the desiccation of Mu'tazilite theology, did not hesitate to proclaim his new faith publicly, and the former Mu'tazilite started combating his colleagues of yesterday. Get a Britannica Premium subscription and gain access to exclusive content.

Abū al

Since this would have made him by birth a member of the Arab-Muslim of the period, he must have received a careful education.
