17th and 18th Century Theories of Emotions > Hume on the Emotions (Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy)

Chrysippus defines distress as a shrinking before what is thought to be a thing to avoid, and pleasure as a swelling at what is thought to be a thing to choose. Arguing especially from ST 1a q. Nevertheless, any book that confines itself for the most part to just one section of the Summa theologiae risks missing the broader context within which that section is embedded.

Such as are adapted to the social nature of man. An excessive emotion is like a runner who is out-of-control because of external causes. The passion for hunting down truth becomes yet stronger when directed at the objects that intrinsically interest us: human nature, particularly the shared passions and sentiments that motivate us and our interactions with other people — in short, the topics of Books II and III of the Treatise.

Philosophical Treatise on the Passions

Eventually the distress diminishes which indicates a weakening of the second proposition, however the first proposition may remain in place. The fourfold pattern of virtues, Gifts, Beatitudes and Fruits is first set out in the preamble to the topic of virtue, ST 1a2ae, q. Although Hume identifies the second impression as the passion proper, understanding its nature and effects requires the whole structure, as we may see in the case of pride.
