How schools can and should respond to student activism

A number of schools recognized the legitimacy of student action, and in those schools teachers were involved.

Citizenship Lesson for Kids

To inspire our students to become civically literate in meaningful ways, we need to create assessments that make them want to learn the skills and knowledge they need to become informed citizens—research, citation, writing, public speaking, collaboration.

We the People Public High School

The world needs more women like you.

We the People Public High School

So many classes across departments, not to mention co-curricular clubs and affinity groups, engage in well-informed conversations about controversial topics every day.

Hendersonville High: Home of the Commandos

Beginning as early as kindergarten, students in New York State are expected to take part in activities related to issues or problems in their classroom or school. Teachers provide document packages with differing views for analysis, and students add additional material from their own research. We wrote and wrote and wrote.
