Peter Abrahams (American author)

Set during the 1920's and 30's before the official institution of apartheid, racial segregation and social caste is the defining feature of the country he grows up in - a fact he becomes increasingly conscious of as he grows older, grapples with ideas of manhood and heritage, experiences dire poverty and violence, and develops a love of language, which gives voice to his dreams and desires. While Abrahams did not touch on the bitterness between himself and Padmore in his subsequent autobiography, the character based on Padmore in Wreath for Udomo the same novel where he portrayed other members of his former social circle, including Kenyatta and Nkrumah in a negative and ominous light , was less than attractive. Padmore was the man to whom politically inclined Blacks gravitated.
