James Harrington: The Commonwealth of Oceana 1656

Similarly, in The Social Contract Rousseau argued that a true republic was only possible in a small state, where the whole population could gather together on a regular basis: 'The Sovereign, having no other force than the legislative power, acts only by means of the laws, and the laws being nothing but the authentic acts of the general will, the Sovereign can only act when the people is assembled. . For what avails it such as are unarmed, or which is all one whose education acquaints them not with the proper use of their swords, to be called citizens? So the whole house is distributed into two seats, each consisting of four benches.
