Western sculpture

The slip was thought to be a fine suspension colloid of illitic clay with very low calcium oxide content and rich in iron oxides and hydroxides, making this surface different from the clay used for the body of the vase. Ancient Greek sculpture is commonly divided in the multiple phases of development; the three main stages are the archaic, classical and Hellenistic periods, but there is also an earlier stage in which the qualities that would come to define ancient Greek sculpture were already beginning to emerge. These are based on pottery styles and were created by Evans and modified by later archaeologists.
