There seems to be a near-universal value that strangers carrying messages between communities should be protected and well treated, even when relations with those who sent them are not good. Summary Within the international society, law and diplomacy have always been complementary and interdependent.

Hudson, Donald Mackinnon, Martin Wight. These changes provided impetus for the second great channel in diplomatic thinking about la raison de système, seeing it less as a system of states and more as one for regulating them and rendering them less harmful.
