Inaugural Lecture

Richard Freeman - Doing Politics Professor Richard Freeman, Personal Chair of Social Science and Public Policy, delivers his inaugural lecture entitled, Doing Politics. And whether you are drawing a piece of Greek armour, or a hawk's beak, or a lion's paw, you will find that the mere necessity of using the hand compels attention to circumstances which would otherwise have escaped notice, and fastens them in the memory without farther effort.

In doing so, he helped place these works at the center of the musical canon. That way, in stead of querying the data, they let the machine find the right questions to ask. Lessons from the past, she argues, can illuminate the possibilities and perils facing intellectuals today who seek to use their science to make a difference in the world.

But grammar is so much more than this. Almost equally often they are viewed as a threat: they do not take into account the value of embodied, co-present teaching, they replace scholarly community with isolation and automation, they are complicit with cultures of surveillance, homogenisation and teacher de-professionalisation. The lecture gave an overview of Professor Slooten's work documenting populations of Hector's and Maui dolphins around New Zealand's coast as well as tracking and documenting behaviour of sperm whales and right whale.

It will describe the process in which the European aesthetic was able to supplant the indigenous theatrical aesthetic. It is not indeed possible for talent so varied as that of English artists to be compelled into the formalities of a determined school; but it must certainly be the function of every academical body to see that their younger students are guarded from what must in every school be error; and that they are practised in the best methods of work hitherto known, before their ingenuity is directed to the invention of others. Recorded on 6 December 2011.
