In other words, theoretically, instead of historical discontinuity the continuity of political history in the late Chosōn has been the main focus of this thesis. This administration system was not that different from the policy making process of the Border Defense Council in the era of Sedo politics, when aristocratic officials from a few well-recognized royal in-law groups held many positions in the highest-level decision making agencies.

However, it seems like the sedo he specifically cites from the Confucian classic is not necessarily the same as the concept of sedo as a political ideology in the early-nineteenth-century of Korea in the sense of rule by the official representative specially appointed by the king. However, the official recruiting system did not become corrupted by them.
