Aristotle's Definition of Rhetoric Example

Now it is plain, from all that has been said, that one thing may be shown to be more important than another from two opposite points of view: it may appear the more important 1 because it is a beginning and the other thing is not, and also 2 because it is not a beginning and the other thing is- on the ground that the end is more important and is not a beginning.

On Rhetoric

The more difficult question is, What is not rhetorical? Besides, it would be absurd if it were considered disgraceful not to be able to defend oneself with the help of the body, but not disgraceful as far as speech is concerned, whose use is more characteristic of man than that of the body. In the first two cases the decision is virtually that of every one, in the last two that of authorities and experts.
