Let us, I urge, settle that a little later on, when I know better what I am doing. Make civil pretence, which deceives neither of us, of wavering, and promise to ring her up in the event of a change of mind.

The Diary of a Provincial Lady by E.M. Delafield

Tells me long story about the Vicar having a sty on one eye.

Ethel returns, ten minutes late, and says Shall she light fire in spare room? Take early train so as to get in extra afternoon.

The Diary of a Provincial Lady by E.M. Delafield

Write them long and eloquent letter about this, but remember after it is posted that I still owe them twelve shillings and sixpence for Maurois's Byron.

The Diary of a Provincial Lady by E.M. Delafield ~ things mean a lot

Would not many of my friends welcome suggestion of a course of treatment— six for 5 guineas —at Madame Dolly Varden's Beauty Parlour in Piccadilly to be placed to my account? Obligated to take taxi from station, mainly owing to chrysanthemums which would not combine well with two suit-cases and fur coat on moving stairway, which I distrust and dislike anyhow, and am only too apt to make conspicuous failure of Stepping Off with Right Foot foremost —but also partly owing to fashionable locality of Rose's flat, miles removed from any Underground. Sudden appearance of our Vicar's wife, who says apologetically that she made a mistake in the time.

Review: The Diary of a Provincial Lady by E.M. Delafield

A man in oilskins tells me I am In the Way there, Miss. Crowds of people at the reception.
