Diderot's Anglophilia and its Impact upon his by William Judson

Presently Diderot frees himself from his model and starts to describe the ways of life in a convent, of which, as a Protestant, Richardson knew little. A man of many talents, Haüy founded the first school for the blind in 1784 and later developed a method of raised letters to teach his students to read.

Yet we may wonder whether the whole memoir of the unhappy nun was indeed nothing but a contrivance imagined by Diderot and his friends to interest the absent and drag him out of his country seat in Normandy back to the circle of Baron d'Holbach. For Diderot, the mind-body disconnection was more theology than science, and correcting the error was worth the risk. The birth and the convent life of Sister Suzanne Simonin have much in common with those of Mile de Lespinasse: see de , Mile de Lespinasse.
