In 1933, White completed her first novel, Frost in May, which fictionalized her experiences at Catholic boarding school and her expulsion. After she left hospital, she spent four years participating in Freudian studies. And yet she felt she did understand, not with her eyes or her brain, but with some faculty she did not even know she possessed.

The other was a man named Tom Hopkinson, a copywriter and S. I do not mean in sensational adventures but in rather odd and difficult personal relationships largely due to their family background and their incomplete understanding of their own natures. In the subsequent five years, after undergoing treatment for mental illness and reconvertng to Catholicism, she completed the Clara Batchelor trilogy, which includes The Lost Traveller, about her relationship with her mother and father, The Sugar House, about her first unconsummated marriage, and Beyond the Glass, about an intense love-affair followed by a breakdown, which is vividly described.
