Transforming the Mental Health System

In Florida, for instance, mental health treatment providers rely on outreach workers to link clients to services, and they rely on district coordinators at the local level to coordinate mental health and employment services. For example, only licensed clinical social workers can deliver certain mental health services, such as clinical assessments and mental health treatment.

Transforming the Mental Health System

It can be useful for families who are dealing with losses, grief, anger and conflict. As a result, some seniors may use alcohol or medications as a means of dealing with the stress related to their present situation.

Transforming the Mental Health System

It will also help in getting feedback from the clients and their significant others, as a way of improving service delivery. While efforts to address the needs of these individuals are still in their infancy, far more programs are in place today than before the advent of welfare reform.
