Corsley also, probably because of its proximity to Frome, retained some part of its industry until about the same date; but its neighbours Homingsham and Crockerton, which, like the rest of the cloth district including Corsley itself, experienced a period of great distress and much emigration in 1829—30, seem to have kept nothing of it afterwards. This incident may account for Young's contemptuous and undeserved references to the unenterprising nature of West of England clothiers in general and those of Wiltshire in particular. A settlement certificate was only valid if it bore the seals of the overseers of both parishes and that of the local Justices and was not transferable.

After an initial period of high mortality, the colonists soon acclimated to their new circumstances. The girl would be examined and if the father could be identified then an order for both maintenance and the cost of delivering the child would be issued. Even before the Civil War there had been woolcombers and serge-weavers in the county and in the later 17th century they were scattered all over it; but in the early 18th century the chief centre for serge was Devizes, which made a strong variety known as 'German Serge' at 4 s.

At the same time, wealthy magnate consumers in England began to use the new fairs as a way to buy goods like spices, wax, preserved fish, and foreign cloth in bulk from the international merchants at the fairs, again bypassing the usual London merchants. Serfs formed the lowest class of feudal society.
