State Leadership in School District Reform: Lessons for Illinois

Those that did not were required to submit proposals to the state as to why their district should remain as is, but risked a state-mandated merger if their proposal was not approved. Columns include national education issues, research and development, innovation, thoughts on teaching, legal issues, a variety of international writers, and editorial opinion.

LEADING CHANGE OF A SCHOOL DISTRICT REORGANIZATION on JSTOR

During this interim period the new district is organized administratively, and significant policy and planning decisions must be made. Each governing board of a new district needs to address issues relevant to that specific district.
