Community Policing: How to Get Started.

Can diverse police departments ease community tension?

The larger turnout followed a call from Dallas Police Chief David Brown to join the force after five officers were killed and others injured in a targeted ambush there last month. Community policing, or community-oriented policing COP , is a that focuses on developing relationships with community members.

Community

Neighborhood team policing was seen by many as a promising way to address problems of over-centralization and bureaucratization of police agencies and of an increasing sense of alienation of citizens and police. Department members introduce various communities to the many NYPD programs and other services offered by other city agencies as part of the department's ongoing efforts to enhance quality of life and to reduce fear and crime.

Community Affairs

Contest winners get the unique opportunity to spend an entire day at Police Headquarters with the Commissioner and other top officials. In fact, they point out, research is mixed as to whether diversity helps reduce tensions.
