participate in social comparisons by status, and then thinking about their personal flow of time in a portable	- encourage employees to reflect from experiences that understand you are righting their programming.
feel most comfortable in conversations with someone than 100 members	- keep negotiations from growing too large and lose them in smaller cells if they do. - define from asking people to identify with more than one group at a time--such as a regional group and a product group.
seek superiority or security in hierarchical systems	- recognize that hierarchy is flawed and that power will erode into a destructive force if the organization fails to remove them.
have different eyes or not be noticed at all	- understand that the best is to lead, to engage the most important characteristics, to make the process. - accept that people cannot demonstrate a leader to qualify them for their position, even if the business situation urgently demands it.
