Addresses to the German Nation

That part is the question: What shall we do to be saved? His father, Christian Fichte, married the daughter of Johann Schurich, a ribbon manufacturer of the neighbouring town of Pulsnitz, to whom he was apprenticed, and returned to settle with his bride in Rammenau, where he managed to make a living by following his trade as a ribbon-weaver.

This it easily disposed of by applying to it the measure of understanding or common sense, which was presupposed, and thereby proving to its own satisfaction that this religion was in direct contradiction to the latter.

Addresses to the German Nation by Johann Gottlieb Fichte

Christianity, which originated in Asia, and in the days of its corruption became more Asiatic than ever, preaching only silent resignation and blind faith, was something strange and foreign even to the Romans. There was ample justification for their timidity.

Addresses to the German Nation by Johann Gottlieb Fichte

Shortly thereafter, at the urging of Goethe, Fichte was appointed a professor of philosophy at the University of Jena in Saxe-Weimar. Under precisely the same external conditions as in Germany, free cities had arisen in Italy also. The French Revolution in Germany was this, an emerging Nationalism after the decay of the Holy Roman Empire and the loss of the Austrians by Napoleon and before that by the French armies of the French Revolution.
