Judith Shakespeare. A romance : Black, William, 1841

She hath eaten naught this morning neither ; 'tis for no wilfulness, poor lass, for she tried an hour ago ; and now 'tis best as I think to leave her alone. Ay, I warrant me the lad would think more of it than of aught else in the world. There Digitized by CjOOQ IC 164 JUDITH SHAKESPEARE.

At first his heart felt like stone, and he could not move, for he thought it was some one coming to seek him with evil news ; but presently, in the clear star-light he knew who this was that was now approaching him. Why, nothing: they might say of her what they pleased now, it was all deserved ; only, the one denuncia- tion of her that she had listened to — the one she had heard from the parson — seemed like the ringing of her death-knell. I would liefer know what she herself thought of him, and how they came to- gether, and how he grew to be on such friendly terms with her.

Prudence, with some faint colour in her pale face, defended Master Blaise to the best of her power; and said she knew he could not have been unduly harsh ; nay, had she not herself, just as he was setting forth, besought him to be kind and considerate with Judith? Cicely, who was seated near the window, and busily engaged in plucking a fowl, uttered a slight cry when she entered, and started up. Prudence can; and that she will be right willing I know.

Prudence — would not that be your proper place? The girl took a little of the broth, some of the spiced bread, and a little of the wine ; but it was clear that she was forcing herself to it. They were women-folk, some of them timid, all of them pious; and they experienced a sense of comfort and safety in submitting to his spiritual domination.

But you see what my father wants ; that is the first thing. I durst not — I durst never see him more — he has cast me off — and — and I de- serve no less! And almost it seemed to him that it was already over. Prudence knew what led me to lend him my father s play ; and where was the harm of it? Digitized by CjOOQ IC 208 JUDITH SHAKESPEARE.
