Eadweard Muybridge Produces the First Photographs of Motion : History of Information

The horizon line is close to the upper limit of the picture plain and the lake stretches beside and behind the encampment, creating a sense of the vastness of inland California and Oregon. It would project sequential images that were traced from a photograph onto a glass disc.

And it all started with a bet. This is implausible for two reasons: first, horses can only run 45—50 miles per hour.

The second, directly below this, shows the disk with a segment in the lower right obscured by the moon, which continues to obscure more of the sun in each exposure, culminating with the fifth exposure, at the upper centre of the Muybridge's image, in which the sun appears only as a thin crescent; Muybridge did not secure a shot of the full eclipse. Therefore, it is likely that Muybridge added this image from another sequence of photographs to end this series—and to indicate the completion of the act of running.

It was first called a zoogyroscope. They were jumping out of their seats with hands raised just to respond and give input. I like how this program, unlike other art class resource membership programs, feels authentic.

What did Eadweard Muybridge photography?

Muybridge's panorama offers a document of San Francisco's cityscape which operates as a testament to the capitalist class with whom the photographer aligned himself. So Muybridge created mechanical shutters, made of wood, rubber springs and a trigger that would snap closed within one-thousandth of a second.
