New critics would maintain that the text itself is the only thing one should take in to account when analysing a text, to look at the techniques used in the text and not to the biography of the author. Rather than developing a traditionally humanist defence, Burke effectively out-theorises theory through rigorous readings which demonstrate that the concept of the author remained profoundly active even and especially as its disappearance was being articulated.

The Death of the Author

Derrida's history of logocentrism denies the author precisely because of the exorbitant recourse it must make to Rousseau as the single systematized instance of an age of logocentric metaphysics. One such path is cleared by Roland Barthes when he describes the origins of modern anti-authorialism as stretching from Mallarmé, through Valéry, Proust and the Surrealists.
