The Man In The Bowler Hat by A.S.J. Tessimond

As he hid himself from the world behind different disguises, his own identity began to disappear even from himself.

Earthfast by A.S.J. Tessimond

In those fifty years since his death, almost all trace of A. His health seems always to have been somewhat precarious owing to a congenital heart condition. Eventually he found a congenial métier as an advertising copywriter.

The dripping tap makes even granite soften We trust the brand-name we have heard so often And join the queue of sheep that flock to buy; We fools who know our folly, you and I. And let's Look over hedges far as eyesight lets us, Since road's not, surely, road, but road and hedge And feet and sky and smell of hawthorn, horse-dung. The 1920s and 30s seemed a wonderful time.

Children of Elizabeth and Thomas Tessimond

Deeply thought as well as deeply felt, these poems reach into that gulf to find him — through recovery of histories both spoken and unspoken as well as an excavation of the spoken word itself. Wood engraved illustration by Paul Kershaw. Deep Field is as strong in celebration as in lamentation.
