The design often included roof playgrounds, kindergartens, communal laundries, and stairways on the courtyard side.

NMHC

During the 1850s, the railroad house or railroad tenement was introduced. In the 1960 census, two-thirds of the housing inventory was made up of one-family detached houses, which declined to less than 60% in the 1990 census. These groups also construct communal housing and often practice slash-and-burn cultivation, which is the least productive use of cropland and has a greater environmental impact than the hunting and gathering of ephemeral dwellers.

NMHC

Thus began the social and public health problems that would increase as the population of cities increased in number and in sophistication. These tenements were typically five stories, with a basement and no elevator elevators were not required for any building of less than six stories.

Chapter 1: Housing History and Purpose

Although the homes were made of the most simple construction materials, many were well over a thousand years old. One of the prime reasons for this change was that these homes were in reality no longer mobile in the true sense. The focus at the time was on the single-family suburban dwelling.
