Paper read before the Bost. I can not refrain, in conclusion, from stating that too much praise can scarcely be awarded the individual curators and their assistants for the untiring energy and patience manifested, and their willingness always to lay aside individual desires and preferences for the welfare of the department as a whole.

Petrographic and geochemical characteristics of iron

Benedict has completed his studies of several groups of Isopod Crustaceans and published reports on the Arcturidee and the genera Synidotea and Idotea. During the year 252 such specimens were marked, making a total thus far of 1,596. Her judicious review offers three conclusions: mass migration remains unresolved both historically and archaeologically; our willingness to accept such has been much influenced by ideological positioning, but elite migration did occur, with or without larger population movement into Britain.
