Long Melford was rated by a article in September 2015, as being one of the Top Ten most desirable villages in Britain. A Georgian brick and plaster replacement was built around 1772 however this was considered rather unappealing and not in keeping with the rest of the building.

Long Melford

A series of empty niches in the south wall most likely once held statues of saints. There was a fairly considerable 19th Century restoration here, as witnessed by the vast sprawl of Minton tiles on the floor, although perhaps the sanctuary furnishings are the building's great weakness. Until its dissolution in 1539, the patron was the incumbent ; after this date, the patronage was held by a prominent local person, transferring either by bequest or by sale.
