

Economic analysis of black migration

MIT Libraries - Mapping migration studies: An empirical analysis of the coming of age of a research field

Abstract

Why do cities adopt and maintain laws that restrict land use, creating a shortage of affordable housing? Dominant explanations emphasize the economic incentives of homeowners to preserve their property values. The origins and racially disparate impacts of these laws suggest another motivating factor: the desire to maintain and further racial segregation by white residents. I characterize for the first time the extent of exclusionary zoning in the United States: across over 100 of the largest cities in the country, the median city allows multi-family housing to be built on only 12% of residential land. Then, leveraging exogenous factors for Black migration to Northern cities from 1940 to 1970, I show that increasing racial diversity causes cities to zone less land for multi-family housing. Analyses of public opinion surveys during this same period show the Great Migration caused a racial backlash among urban white voters, which translated to policy action. This evidence suggests that exclusionary zoning was designed to maintain racial segregation and that opposition to multi-family housing cannot just be explained by desire to maintain property values. I make out alternative explanations of increased homeownership rates, different institutions, or differences in federal intervention driving variation in zoning. These findings show how racial threat can be channeled into racialized public policy and provide a new explanation for inequality in housing markets today.

Why African Americans left the South in droves — and what's bringing them back

Driven from their homes by unsatisfactory economic opportunities and harsh segregationist laws, many Black Americans headed north, where they took advantage of the need for industrial workers that arose during the First World War. Australia and Germany have successfully tested programs to train migrants in needed skills before they arrive, part of a model that CGD has proposed called Global Skill Partnerships.
