his map to prove that air circulated clockwise around areas of high pressure; he coined the term 'anticyclone' to describe the phenomenon. Because statistically, weather systems do not always develop as predicted.

In general, dependence on prior information should be minimized wherever reliable classification can be made from the satellite observations themselves, which is aided by new SST sensors that provide measurements in more bands, and at higher spatial and temporal resolution. With the information content of these channels, the potential for more accurate SST retrievals in the presence of aerosols arises , but this is yet to be widely exploited.

In dynamic and coastal regions of the ocean, and around ice, uncertainty in the prior SST is larger, and misclassification more likely.
