Leif Erikson

The only two known strictly historical mentions of Vinland are found in the work of c. During one of these explorations,

Tyrker discovered that the land was full of vines and grapes. The first winter he was at Eriksey, nearly in the middle of the eastern settlement; the spring after repaired he to Eriksfjord, and took up there his abode.

Leif Erikson

The Vikings allegedly sailed to the Eastern Mediterranean next. A significant number of bones of marine animals can be found at the settlements, suggesting increased hunting with the absence of farmed food. His work received little support from mainstream historians and archeologists at the time, and even less today.

Eriksfjord Erik's fjord and his farm are shown, as is the location of the bishopric at Gardar.

Vikings

In the end there were no permanent Norse settlements in Vinland, although sporadic voyages at least to Markland for forages, timber and trade possibly lasted for centuries. However the fort they were staying in was defeated by the Eastern Wessex militia and the ships, cargo, women, and children were taken. When his name was whispered in , it was one to be feared.
