Women of Bloomsbury: Virginia, Vanessa, and Carrington by Mary Ann Caws

Women of Bloomsbury: Virginia, Vanessa and Carrington.

I have only skimmed it to date, since I am still in the process of finishing up Hermione Lee's biography, but it promises to be very thought provoking and a way to fill in some knowledge gaps of some very interesting people in their own right. The book is meant in large measure to remedy wide misunderstanding of Carrington's unreturnable for Lytton Strachey 118.

This approach is similar to that adopted in a 1979 volume of Issues in Marxist Philosophy, where Mepham argued against any teleological linkage of Marx's Grundrisse to the Capital, and instead suggested their being formally and substantively different.

Women of Bloomsbury: Virginia, Vanessa and Carrington.

Interpretation shallow and psychologically uninformed takes priority over exposition: we find out why Carrington committed suicide in the first chapter, who she is in the sixth. Three Bloomsbury women: a great writer, a talented painter, and an unsuccessful, reclusive artist.

There are useful tables of book sales, of the Woolf's comparative incomes, of income from reviewing, and annual numbers of essays and reviews published. There was some more information about the three primary women in the famous Bloomsbury Group than I knew. This is its truest, most touching, contribution.
