Renewable energy, comprising bagasse, firewood, solar energy and hydro-electricity, accounted for about 6% of the domestically available energy. Graph 5 compares Australia's total primary energy supply net energy consumption per capita since the early 1970s with a number of other developed countries as well as Asia.

1992

For every one unit of electricity generated, about three units of coal must be burnt, a relatively greenhouse expensive process.

1992

It should be noted that some differences may also occur between the published National Greenhouse Gas Inventory NGGI AGO 2000 and data presented here. It is worth noting that, although hydro-electricity can be considered a primary energy source, it is treated as secondary in the supply and use tables for ease of comparison with thermal electricity generation.
