Jizo are given hats and bibs to keep them warm in the hopes that Jizo will do the same for children in the afterlife. A story from the Edo Era 1615-1868 goes like this. But in China less so in Japan, he is typically portrayed as a female divinity.

It is also emphasized by her close friendship with the very feminine Chisato, who can be compared to musumeyaku, actresses who perform female roles in the same theater. There is even a Shogun Jizo, dressed in armor, who protects soldiers in battle.

Sho Chiku Bai Premium Ginjo

This custom is closely related to the Shitarare Jizō tradition. In later centuries, the Japanese recommended that children with smallpox be clothed in red garments and that those caring for the sick also wear red. More than 1,000 exist across Japan, with the head shrines standing at the foot and the summit of Mount Fuji itself.
