Thousands still trapped at sea as more ports turn away cruise ships

Now I choose when I want to think about it. And so these numbers have been reduced quite, quite significantly.

In every direction, the view is the same: nothing. The ship had left Cape Town, South Africa on its way to New York when it was attacked by a German U-boat a few hundred miles off the coast of Brazil. During the voyage, someone showed symptoms of the deadly disease.

She was trapped at sea alone with her assailant. He told her, ‘You’re mine for the week.’

That same day, executives at sister company to disembark the cruise director of its Liberty of the Seas ship in Galveston, Texas, and provided a private car to take him home to Memphis, Tennessee, 615 miles away.

They had drifted over 5,000 miles and were lost at sea for 484 days. That said, another Princess Cruises ship that had been searching for a home, the 2,600-passenger Golden Princess, finally was able to disembark passenger Thursday in Melbourne, Australia.

Nations Urged to Help Virus

After the ship offloaded its last guests in New York City on March 15, Captain Karl Staffan Bengtsson made an announcement to crew that someone who had been on the ship recently had tested positive for COVID-19. Crew members say they wondered how there could be a possible COVID-19 case if the company had been testing those with symptoms for the disease all along.
