Morris Oxford flatnose

Alongside the tourer and the new all-steel saloon, a fabric-bodied car was offered until 1932, when it and the tourer were dropped and a coupé introduced.

The Bullnose And The Flatnose Morris

The car is another example of flat-nose Oxford, in this case a tourer.

SLIDER: Bullnose and Flatnose Morrises

. Jacket has some shelfwear with surface marks, minor scoring, bumped corners and spine ends and the spine is sunned.

Morris Engines

Head-on view of a 1928 car. Gone was the 'Bullnose' radiator, now replaced by the cheaper and more efficient 'Flatnose' radiator, behind which sat the same 1548cc sv 4-cylinder engine. The binding is straight and tight.

The mudguards were black and the standard body colour was a chocolate brown. Three people are sat inside, while their cases have been banished to the car's rear luggage rack. As further expansion, to meet the rising demand for power units, was foreseen, Morris purchased a 45-acre 180,000 m² site north of Coventry at in 1927 and a mechanised foundry, together with the machining of cylinder blocks, was set up there.

The Bullnose Morris Club

An old-style bottle of milk rests on the Oxford's running board.

The Bullnose Morris Club

A small step can just been seen, above the nearside rear wing, on which rear-seat passengers would climb to access the outdoor seating area.

Simon Cars

It remained available until 1926.
