The descendants of Ívarr continued to play a role in politics across the Irish Sea until the twelfth century and they commanded significant economic and military resources. By the 820s vikings had raided the points on the Irish coast which stood farthest from Scandinavia, and from the 830s Irish chroniclers recorded the founding of numerous camps at coastal points and deep into the interior of the island Figure 2.

Of the eighteen cases of duels or challenges to a duel noted in Geneva, seven concern nobles including six foreigners, seven involved Geneva patricians, five common people, craftsmen or small traders, four involved soldiers, and one theology students. The incomplete and partial nature of the surviving written sources for viking activity in England must be taken into account when one is constructing a historical narrative. It is in the Irish chronicles that we can trace the origins and endurance of the power of the dynasty of Ívarr: Ireland was the springboard for their considerable achievements overseas.

The diverse nature of their weaponry seems conducive to the aims of a permanent military force, and the specific emphasis being placed on the presence of skilled weaponry such as the bow would appear to corroborate this. The men of Munster assembled to meet him after the expulsion of the Danes and the base Norsemen from the towns and fair fortresses. This viking was probably the ancestor Donn- chad ua JiEruilb who is mentioned as one of the four crown princes of the foreigners in 1014 War of the Gaedhil, p.
