The Applegate Trail

They left the Oregon Trail and the Malheur River and headed due west across central Oregon. In 1843 three brothers, Jesse, Lindsay, and Charles Applegate and their families, joined the emigrants who traveled the Oregon Trail. It was blamed on the Modoc Indians, but the Modoc said it was another tribe further east that attacked the wagon train.

As the party was rafting down the river just outside The Dalles one of their rafts capsized and Lindsay's son Warren, age 9, Jesse's son Edward, also age 9, along with Alexander Mac age 70 drowned.

Over the Applegate Trails to Oregon in 1846: The Pringle Diary

The large and impressive Black Rock Spring was the first adequate source of both water and grass that emigrants encountered on the approximately fifty miles of trail from the Humboldt River. Within this dynamic terrain is a special 275,000 acre wine appellation known as the Applegate Valley AVA.

East Applegate Ridge Trail

Hundreds of springs, green glades, and lush meadows mix with towering forests on this layered and fractured volcanic plateau half-a-mile above the Rogue Valley. As the wagon trains collected at Fort Hall Idaho, the newest trail known as Applegate was a viable option for wagon masters. There are sections of class three scrambling and exposed terrain, and a fall would result in serious injury or worse.
