Researching and Strengthening Student Resilience on College Campuses

In 2003, Sabine Parish—a poor, low-performing school district in rural Louisiana—hired Dorman Jackson as superintendent because of his reputation for raising test scores. While learning to manage stress is part of the experience, many students report extreme levels of stress, anxiety, depression and other conditions that negatively affect their overall wellness and ability to succeed and thrive. Of all the predictors, being excluded from school and associating with an anti-social peer group were the strongest and most consistent predictors of these behaviors.
