Second Battle of the Atlantic

Voyaging treacherous sea highways to deliverance or disaster, by mid-1940 the North Atlantic convoys already were in grave danger. A three-barrelled mortar, it projected 100 lb 45 kg charges ahead or abeam; the charges' firing pistols were automatically set just prior to launch. Warwick had told the Captain that, as the senior officer, he ought to command the escorts of the first convoy from New York to Norfolk, Virginia.

British propaganda during World War II

On 12 February 1940, the dispute was initially settled in favour of the Göring—Frank view, which ended the economically disruptive mass expulsions. Subsequently, the common practice of surfacing at night to recharge batteries and refresh air was mostly abandoned as it was safer to perform these tasks during daylight hours when enemy planes could be spotted. Godt and Dönitz instead opted for a strategic redeployment, withdrawing the wolfpacks to the relative safety of the Azores.

British WWII films based on true events

The Battle for the Atlantic had been relatively quiet during the months preceding June 1940, with U-boats diverted to assist with the invasion of Norway, where they had suffered four losses and found their confidence eroded. It also had the additional effect, detrimental as far as Dönitz was concerned, of forcing the immediate introduction of a convoy system.

Voices from the Battle of the Atlantic

The military did not challenge Hitler's dominance of the war effort, and senior officers generally supported and enacted his decisions.

Reuben James

As a result, the typical British war film attempts to construct a gripping suspense story which at the same time conveys propaganda ideas in support of the Allied cause. The U-boats were further critically hampered after by the loss of their bases in France to the advancing Allied armies.
