Caught between domestic violence and a the suffering of migrant women

Partnerships with other multicultural services were characterised by informal processes and were usually relationship-based. Most survey participants reported that evidence-based practices were a feature of the programs and services delivered to migrant and refugee women.

Migrant and refugee women in Australia

Funding for post-settlement services and reporting requirements: A lack of dedicated funding towards support services for migrant and refugee women in the post-settlement period that is beyond five years after arrival was identified as a service gap by the service providers participating in the research. Undertaking further research to capture the perspectives of the clients themselves would further enhance understanding about the service sector, the issues that are important in migrant women's lives and strategies that can help to empower migrant and refugee women. These data are used to describe the nature and types of services delivered to refugee and migrant clients as reported by participants in the online survey of service providers and client characteristics and outcomes.

Due to very small sample sizes see footnote 16 , services and programs delivered in other states are not reported in this figure, but note sample sizes are small also for the states reported on here.

Migrant and refugee women in Australia

Excludes those with four or more children. Or strategies that have worked well? For example, among women with school-only education, 21% of humanitarian migrants with two children and 36% of humanitarian migrants with no children were employed, compared with 34% and 65% of women in the family partner category and 58% and 74% of the general population with the same characteristics. Participant 2 - Employment support service We identify women champions from the refugee background and promote their success stories to inspire other new arrivals.

Government review targets immigrants

The survey captures which programs and services had information available for clients in languages other than English, employed female bilingual workers and had female interpreters available to assist with delivery.
