Impact of Nuclear Weapons on International Relations

Europe itself, by 1871, seemed to be entering an age of political and social progress. End of the Traditional Euro-Centric International Power Structure: ADVERTISEMENTS: The two wars, particularly the Second World War destroyed the old international power structure and gave rise to a new structure.

Understanding the Current International Order

Gaddis and other analysts argue that this is a direct result of the nuclear revolution. Berghahn Books , Oxford 2010 p.

Balance of power since 1945

Since critical theories and other alternative theoretical perspectives question the existing status quo, make knowledge dependent on power, and emphasize identity formation and social change, they are not traditional or non-positivist. Realists view human beings as inherently egoistic and self-interested to the extent that self-interest overcomes moral principles. The unifications of Italy and Germany removed the congeries of central European principalities that dated back to the , while the breakup of eastern and southeastern Europe into small and quarreling states a process that would yield the term balkanization was not far advanced.

Major Military Operations Since World War II

It began to have talks with the USSR without the approval of the American bloc.

The Role of Nuclear Weapons in International Politics: A Strategic Perspective

The tension between expediency and morality lost its validity in the sphere of politics. By 1975, the number of states sitting in the General

Assembly had nearly tripled, as decolonization proceeded rapidly in the wake of the mass destruction wrought by World War II, in conjunction with the tide of nationalist independence movements that rippled across what became known as the Third World.
