Ana Deumert (Head of Section)

Bold asserts that Fanakalo has also spread to domestic service spheres. I am also the co-editor of a forthcoming volume on the colonial history of German with Mark Louden, University of Wisconsin, Hans Boas, University of Austin, and Peter Maitz, University of Augsburg.

Language and social history: Studies in South African sociolinguistics

This discussion raised most of the major issues of the conference: the characteristics distinctive of these languages; what the characteristics imply about users of the languages; the linguistic and social prerequisites of the processes involved; theories as to the origin of known pidgins and creoles. Interests and Current Research Projects Ana's research is located in the fields of sociolinguistics and linguistic anthropology, and she supervises a wide range of postgraduate theses in these fields.

Fanakalo: the language of mining culture

Tsuzaki, University of Hawaii; Albert Valdman, Indiana University; Jan Voorhoeve, University of Leiden; Keith Whinnom, University of Exeter.

Pidginization and Creolization of Languages: Their Social Contexts

Samarin reported on statistical studies of characteristics of pidgins and other forms of speech. Allen Grimshaw vigorously reviewed the development of comparative sociology, its relations with linguistics, and their areas of common interest. It is likely that the next decade will see as great a transformation of our knowledge in all these respects as has the last.
