Fleet Air Arm attacks the Tirpitz

We jumped in the car immediately and drove over there.

Sinking of the Battleship Tirpitz

It was hoped that if German forces spotted the British fleet it would be assumed that the warships were supporting the convoy.

Battleship Tirpitz

Tirpitz was eventually disabled and then sunk by heavy bombers in late 1944. These were completed on April 2, 1944, and sea trials were planned for the following day in Altafjord.

While stationed in Norway, Tirpitz was also intended to be used to intercept Allied convoys to the Soviet Union, and two such missions were attempted in 1942. In November, Admiral Erich Raeder, commander of the Kriegsmarine, ordered the battleship to Norway so that it could strike at Allied convoys. As the Lancasters turned for home, the ship was in its death throes.
